This project started in the Bob Hope Memorial Library at the Ellis Island National Museum of Immigration while I was working on my first book. In conversation, Barry Moreno commented on the lack of scholarship regarding Chinese at Ellis Island. It was an offhand observation, but it led me to years of research and rethinking. My deep thanks to Barry for all his work documenting the history of Ellis Island and to George Tselos and the late Jeffrey Dosik, also of the Bob Hope Memorial Library.

My research was not only sparked but also sustained by dedicated librarians and archivists. Most centrally, I appreciate the extraordinary work of the staff at the National Archives and Records Administration in New York City: Kelly McAnnaney, Bonnie Sauer, Matthew Aull, Katie Daniels, Kevin Reilly, Carol Savo, Angela Tudico, and Trina Yeckley. At the National Archives in Washington, D.C., my research was supported by George Briscoe and William Creech, along with others engaged in locating and screening files. And at Archives II in College Park, Maryland, by Lynne Goodsell, Holly Reed, and many others in the Textual Records and Still Photographs divisions. Closer to home, I have relied on librarians at Michigan State University for support in my research, teaching, and learning. In particular, I want to acknowledge Leslie Behm, Julia Ezzo, Kristen Mapes, and Emilia Marcyk. Thanks especially to Jeffrey Evans, Amanda Tickner, and Kasey Wilson, who created the map of Asian routes to Ellis Island, and Jingyi Zhang at the Center for Statistical Training and Consulting, who provided much-needed statistical assistance. At the Library of Congress, I was lucky to work with Remé-Antonia Grefalda, founding director of the library's Asian and Pacific Islander Collection. At the Museum of the Chinese in America, New York, my research was ably assisted by Samantha Chin Wolner. At the History Office and Library of U.S. Citizenship and Immigration Services, Marian Smith and Zack Wilske answered many, many questions. I was also assisted by other dedicated librarians and archivists, including at the Brooke Russell Astor Reading Room for Rare Books and Manuscripts, New York Public Library; the Columbia University Rare Book and Manuscript Library; and the Japanese American National Museum, Los Angeles.

Financially, my research was supported by Celia Vlasin, as part of the Vlasin Family Fellowship, the James Madison College Faculty Development Fund, and the Humanities and Arts Research Program, all at Michigan State University.

Washington, D.C., and New York City are expensive cities in which to conduct research. I am very lucky to have friends and family who were willing to accommodate me while I was visiting archives and libraries. Claudia Malloy and Chris Kleponis have been the most generous hosts and the best of friends as I spent weeks in D.C. over a period of years. My brother- and sister-in-law, Mark and Pat Gordon, were equally generous with their home in New York City. Mark passed away after I completed my research for this project. I am so grateful for the coffee, waffles, and company sitting in their kitchen, and so glad that I stayed to help complete the crossword when I should have been in the archives.

At Michigan State University, I have continued to find purpose in my work thanks to my students, colleagues, and friends. Teaching in the James Madison College, an undergraduate residential college of public affairs, and the Asian Pacific American Studies Program, I work with students who care about the past and the ways that we learn about the past today. But they care even more deeply about the future. I want to acknowledge all my students. Working with them in the classroom and outside the classroom has been the greatest joy of my scholarly life. In particular, my undergraduate research assistants spent hours poring over Annual Reports of the Commissioner General of Immigration, case files, newspaper articles, and passenger lists. Thank you to Lauren Abrahamson, Eleanor Bell, Daniel Davis, William Hack, Ian Hoopingartner, Courtney Heyse, Olivia Macy Rose, Cecilia Tang, and Salena Thompson. Special thanks to GlenEllen Lehmberg and Liz Witcher for their research work at the National Archives, to Jonathan Suan for his detailed newspaper research on both this and my next project, and to graduate student Scott Bullock for his insightful observations on the manuscript.

In the James Madison College and the Asian Pacific American Studies program, I have benefited from extraordinary colleagues who care for one another and for our students. Across and outside of Michigan State University, I have also played a small part in a band of survivors, supporters, students, and parents who have tried and tried and tried again—sometimes failing and sometimes succeeding—to make our institution more transparent, accountable, just, and safe for all. In this work, Andaluna Borcila has been a steadfast partner and brilliant collaborator. I owe a special measure of friendship and debt of gratitude to Kirsten Fermaglich, Andrea Louie, Terese Guinsatao Monberg, Mindy Morgan, and Naoko Wake. Terese deserves mention for first suggesting that the article I was writing about Asians at Ellis Island might, in fact, be a book. And Kirsten, in various tea shops and coffee shops throughout the years, read more versions of this work than anyone. I appreciate so much our working and writing together.

The longer I teach, the more I realize my intellectual debts to Robert G. Lee and George Sánchez, who helped me look away from Ellis Island as I explored my interests in Asian migration and immigration policy for my first book, only to have me turn my attention eastward again. Jack and Audrey Isbester are some of my oldest friends and best teachers about activism and ships. At conferences and
